In-House Sales Teams Are Costly to Build — And Often Fail to Deliver

Every founder wants a strong sales engine. But building one in-house comes with hidden costs, slow ramp-up, and inconsistent results — especially for lean, fast-moving businesses.

Expensive to Recruit & Retain

Sourcing, interviewing, and onboarding good sales talent takes months — and sales roles see some of the highest attrition of any function.

Slow Time-to-Revenue

New in-house hires typically take several months to fully ramp up before they start contributing meaningful, predictable revenue.

Inconsistent, Unpredictable Results

Without structured processes and accountability, in-house teams frequently miss targets and leave leadership guessing on pipeline health.

Missing Industry-Specific Expertise

Selling SaaS, enterprise software, or IT solutions requires domain fluency — generalist hires often struggle to speak the customer's language.

Heavy Management Overhead

Recruiting, training, CRM tooling, coaching, and performance management pull founder and leadership attention away from the core business.

Locked Into Fixed Payroll

Full-time hires mean fixed costs regardless of pipeline performance — with no easy way to scale sales capacity up or down as the business needs.

Net Result

Founders end up spending months and significant budget building a sales function that still isn't reliably hitting growth targets — capital and time that lean businesses can't afford to lose.
